RE: Draft Insecticide Strategy to Reduce Exposure of Federally Listed Endangered and Threatened Species and Designated Critical Habitats from the Use of Conventional Agricultural Insecticides (EPA-HQ-OPP-2024-0299)

Dear Deputy Assistant Administrator Li,

As farmers, ranchers, agricultural producers, applicators, landowners, and individuals who provide professional support to U.S. agriculture, we write to express our great concern and opposition to the draft Insecticide Strategy (IS) as proposed (EPA-HQ-OPP-2024-0299). Insect pests are some of the most devastating threats facing agricultural crops. Denying the U.S. agricultural community the ability to meaningfully access and use an array of insecticidal tools, as we are concerned would result from the draft IS, would inflict significant, irreparable harm to the food, fuel, and fiber we produce, our operations, and the consumers we serve. We strongly urge EPA to reconsider this complex, flawed proposal to ensure U.S. agriculture can continue to protect itself from destructive insect pests.

Insecticides are essential for protecting U.S. agricultural operations. Our farms face numerous insect threats, including stinkbugs, psyllids, drosophila, aphids, grubs, lepidopteran, grasshoppers, and beetles, to name a few. Without meaningful access or the ability to use insecticides, these insect pests can quickly destroy an entire crop. Many of these pests can also transmit secondary pests, including bacteria, viruses, or fungal infections, risking further crop damage. We are not only concerned with the draft IS' direct impact on our ability to use tools to control these pests; if producers cannot adequately protect their crops or fields, insect pests can quickly spread throughout an entire region, placing other crops and producers at risk. Some conservation practices, such as cover crops, which can harbor overwintering insect pests, can also require access to insecticides to maintain. Billions of dollars in potential damage to crops, conservation outcomes, and U.S. agricultural communities hang in the balance, and many farms may not be able to survive losing access to these tools. EPA must consider these potentially devastating impacts when determining next steps on this flawed Strategy.

Our concerns with the draft IS are several, including its immense complexity. Determining how a pesticide user or applicator must comply includes considering numerous factors, several of which can change up to the time of application. These factors include, but are not limited to, whether a field exists in one or more of ten pesticide use limitation areas (PULA); the runoff potential of the counties in which an application is being made; field characteristics, including slope, soil type, and distance to unmanaged areas; the type of application being made (foliar, soil, seed treatment, ground, aerial, etc.); weather conditions, including humidity, windspeed, and direction; pests being treated and the pesticidal active ingredients being used; droplet size and application rate needed to effectively treat pests; the crop type being grown; existing runoff/erosion or spray drift mitigations on a field or orchard; and whether on-field mitigation is required. Further, a producer or applicator would not need to consider these factors for just one field but could need to consider them for dozens or hundreds of fields under management. These complexities alone could make it difficult for many operations, especially smaller producers with limited resources, to continue using insecticides.

Another challenge is the cost and feasibility of many of the mitigations provided in the draft IS. While there are more compliance options compared with previous proposals, such as the draft Herbicide Strategy, many of the options presented will still create agronomical, economic, or pest management difficulties. For example, many of the runoff, erosion, or spray drift mitigations provided (riparian areas, filter strips, etc.) will require physical modifications to fields or orchards and would likely cost hundreds to thousands of dollars per field to install and maintain, including significant labor costs. Many may be prohibited by land rental contracts as well, further limiting options for hundreds of millions of farmland acres. We continue to have concerns with others, such as rate reductions, which may lead to resistance management challenges if not revised. Edge of field practices, such as riparian areas, or significant downwind spray buffers could also leave large crop areas untreated and allow for swift pest reinfestation of treated areas, resulting in significant crop damage.

Under the draft IS, many producers will lack sufficient runoff/erosion and spray drift compliance mitigations to continue effectively using insecticides essential to their operations. EPA should add other options not contingent on geography or crop type, such as risk reduction training courses or drift reduction adjuvants. Additionally, EPA should offer exemption from further runoff/erosion mitigation for farming operations already participating in state or other best management practice plans aimed at reducing runoff and soil erosion.

While we support the protection of wildlife and our environment, we do not believe this complicated Strategy and the costly restrictions it would impose are necessary to accomplish this goal or bring EPA into compliance with the Endangered Species Act. In determining risks to species, EPA continues to use unrefined models and does not incorporate real-world scientific and commercial data (pesticide usage data, percent of crop treated, etc.), which overstates risks and concludes pesticide users and applicators must adopt more costly restrictions than are truly necessary to protect listed species. We strongly urge EPA to revise its process for considering risks to species to be more reflective of real-world pesticide uses and conditions, which in turn will result only in protections that are genuinely necessary and supported by the best available science.

In conclusion, we have great concerns with and oppose the draft IS as proposed. Its immense complexity and lack of compliance options risks imposing billions of dollars in regulatory burdens on U.S. farmers, producers, and applicators, all while exposing agricultural operations, conservation efforts, and rural communities to billions of dollars in damage from insect pests. We urge EPA to reconsider its approach to this onerous, complicated Strategy, including reducing its complexity, adding greater flexibility for compliance, and refining how the Agency determines risks to species. Failing to do so will inflict significant, irreparable harm on the producers of our nation's food, fuel, and fiber, and the consumers we serve.

Sincerely,
